POÈME

Acrylic 50 x 70 cm (2010) (S1028)

The dark season asks for bright pictures, conciliatory sounds and quiet hours. It's the yellow, warm shades we're missing during this time bare of sun; bright light, that can't be substituted by glittering and flickering christmas trees in shopping malls; we need pastel colours and no glaring gloss papers; we need contemplative music and no 'Jingel Bell blares'...

Let's give more poetry to life, let us allow ourselves a few more liberties and bring back again the frozen smile on our lips, then light will come by itself. The yellow shades add a discreet warmth to the picture, but no exuberance of feelings, this would need more colour. The glittering glimmer splinters are the light sparks that add a poetic note to the ordinary. The dancing movements of the lines guide us towards the music which produced it's poetic pieces, too, as, for example 'Poème' by Ernest Chausson.
